Duquesne Energy and Environmental Law Journal Presents a Collaboration with the Students of Professor Neacsu's Spring 2023 Climate Change Law Class

Every year in September, environmental organizations nationwide come together to recognize Environmental Awareness Month. This year, in recognition of Environmental Awareness Month, Joule Duquesne Kline Law School's Energy & Environmental Law Journal, is pleased to collaborate with the students of Professor Dana Neacsu's Spring 2023 Climate Change Law Class. In this class, students are tasked with writing an article addressing timely and important environmental topics, specifically those relating to climate change law. Joule is happy to provide these students with a platform to share their research and ideas addressing climate change and the laws governing the environment.¹

Joule intends on being an important and useful resource for understanding energy and environmental law in Pennsylvania, the United States, and the world at large. This collaboration not only presents an opportunity to reflect on the constantly changing landscape of environmental issues facing the planet, but also allows student's hard work and originality to be highlighted in the hopes they too can be a useful resource to others. We thank our readers for their interest in and attention to the topics addressed in the following articles.
